Cheyenne Bottoms is one of the largest wetlands in the central United States (19,857 acres) and is a wetland of international importance. Nearly half of the migrating waterfowl and wading birds stop here as they migrate between Canada and Mexico. Having current imagery and vegetation maps help refuge managers monitor the conditions of critical habitats and food sources as well as track the spread of invasive species like cattail and phragmites.